The Host City of Santa Maria

The first known inhabitants of the region currently occupied by Santa Maria city were the Minuti Indians and Tapes. The city was created from camps of a demarcation commission of the boundaries between lands of Spanish and Portuguese dominion that were in the region.

During the Farroupilha Revolution (1835-1845), the first German immigrants from São Leopoldo arrived, seeking to get out of the fighting.

The city preserves historic buildings of great value, such as the Cathedral of Nossa Senhora da Conceição, Treze de Maio Theater, the Cathedral of the Mediator of the Episcopal Anglican Church of Brazil, the Caixeiral Club of Santa Maria, the National Bank of Commerce, Union Society of The Travelers' Clerks and the Belgian Village. Santa Maria hosts one of the largest public universities in Brazil, the Federal University of Santa Maria. The university currently has almost 27,000 students in its undergraduate and postgraduate courses.

By having a large amount of educational institutions, the city is known as "Culture City".

Santa Maria is also called the "Heart of Rio Grande" because of its geographical location.

The city of Santa Maria stands out in the regional and national scenarios as an important strategic center for the National Defense, because it is in the center of the State and equidistant from the capitals of neighboring countries to Brazil. In addition, it has an important network of roads and railroads. Thus, these were the reasons why, over time, many barracks were placed in the "Heart of Rio Grande".
